Winning is the Acceptable Approach to Life than just Participating

Renowned and famous, Elon Musk's innovation of re-usable rockets is a ground breaking innovation for rocket science. With such innovation, the technological knowledge we have of physics has never so supreme than before. At the rate we are going right now, <sup>creating</sup> life in other planets is more possible. Similarly, Steven Hawking's theory of the black hole has given us a number of theories that can be used in the knowledge we now call science. If these two people were just participating, it would not have made them successful and the impact they have brought to the world would have never existed.

Fame and ~~power~~ <sup>influence</sup> does not come by participating it comes from winning. Thousands of people ~~participate~~ participate in programs, this can include sports and other type of functions, but only few are recognised and get selected to the next level. The next level is fame and influence. A & The King of Football Pelé
For instance, his family background was poor and his mother worked at a house maid. He then face various challenges throughout life, after which he participated to become a part of the Brazilian national team. He did what he was good at and with him in the national team of Brazil, the country never lost a world cup. He invented the famous bicycle kick. As such he is still remembered as the greatest football player that ever played. Similarly Jack Ma the founder of Ali Baba is also a true champion. He comes from a very low profile family in China. He moved to the US and learnt English. Later on founded Ali Baba after several failures and struggles. He participated and won. As such this makes both Pelé and Jack Ma the one of the most influential and famous people around the world.

winners control the game, participants become the spectators. The world we now live in is a game controlled by winners. The participants either play in it or become the side viewers. Whole countries can be taken for example as winners. Countries such as the US and the UK are considered as winners in today's context. The United States of America is a winner because of the impact it has on the world's economy. Every currency in the world is valued in comparison to the US dollar. Most of the trade and the international organisations are controlled by the US. This includes the Millennium Challchallenge Corporation, World Trade Organisation etc. This makes them winners as nation states are far less powerful in current context than international organisation, with turnovers greater than their GDP. Similarly the United Nations United Kingdom is also a winner in the world stage. The UK controlled over one third of the world during the 19th century with influence and colonialism. From this UK was able to become strong and powerful. The English language we speak today is evidence enough to suggest that UK is a winner. Other countries have also participated and contributed to the world, but the UK and US have dominance in culture in just the basic manner. This makes both countries winners among the 'participant' countries such as Nepal.

For However, participation is an important ingredients needed to become a winner. Most people who are capable to winning do not participate. This just makes them spectators in life. But when one shall participate, so shall they they have the "motive to win. Thus, ~~winning~~ winning is everything, participation without the motive to win is a waste of time. Even though one may not win, the next time they should try harder.

In conclusion to what has been stated so far, Participation must be done however it should be done intended to win. Participation without winning is completely a waste. Yes, one may lose but should not give up to defeat. Winning is the philosophy of life, participation is just being alive not making a change in life. Thus, participation must be there but there must be ~~win~~ winning as a aim.
